ABRAHAM LINCOLN AS WE WAS KNOWN DURING HIS LIFE

Before He Was President and After His Personality Touched Lives of Local People Who Recall Important Incidents Vividly

Lincoln and the Union Pacific

General G. M. Dodge's Story.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S first by locating the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific railroad has not been generally understood. General Grenville M. Dodge of Council Bluffs, who was in charge of the location and early work of construction of the road, tells of his meetings with President Lincoln.

"I was privileged to see Abraham Lincoln but twice during his life. The first time was in the fall of 1859, when he addressed a meeting here in Council Bluffs," said General Dodge. "The second time was during the war at the time I was in command at Corinth, Miss., at a meeting of generals, which I was ordered to attend, in order to report to President Lincoln in Washington.

"I had known of Mr. Lincoln some time prior to his visit to Council Bluffs, as he was the owner of some lots in Council Bluffs, while the owner of the adjoining property was General L. Vallandigham of Ohio. It was through Mr. Lincoln's ownership of Council Bluffs lots that I first came to know him.

"I met saw Mr. Lincoln in Washington in 1864, during the civil war, whenever I had been ordered by General Grant at Mr. Lincoln's request. I did not see him again after my Washington interview with him. I was in command of the western military department at St. Louis at the time of his death. My estimate of President Lincoln is that he was one of the greatest men that this country has ever produced. In my two interviews with him I came to know him well. He was fire-eating and seemed side even to the awful turmoil of war to comprehend the great crisis of the country when war should come.

"I have been invited to deliver an address upon President Lincoln in Council Bluffs at the centenary celebration of his birth next month and will there endeavor to give more into detail of my acquaintance with him."

In the February issue of Appleton's General Dodge, in alluding to Mr. Lincoln, accords to him the full measure of credit for his participation in events that made the building of the Union Pacific railroad possible. In his article General Dodge says: "My first work in an enumerated corps was in 1853 on the Chicago & Rock Island railroad, as it built westward from Chicago. We made a survey for the extension of the road from the Mississippi river and established the terminus in Council Bluffs. I bought the eighty acres on which these terminals were located and subdivided the tract, a portion being taken by the Rock Island interests and a portion by Council Bluffs parties. Some of the lots of the railroad company were taken by N. B. Judd, the grandfather of the present Judge. He was a prominent Illinois republican, the intimate friend of Mr. Lincoln, and he represented in the debates with Stephen A. Douglas. Mr. Lincoln's attention was drawn to the progress of the road westward and to the opportunities it offered. He therefore bought from Mr. Judd a portion of his interests in that tract, and his visit to Council Bluffs had a strong part in my decision to remain in the country and looking after his real estate interests. I was just then returning from making a reconnaissance westward for the proposed Pacific railroad and reached Council Bluffs at the same time as did Mr. Lincoln. We both stopped at the Pacific hotel. After dinner Mr. Lincoln sought me out and made many inquiries of me regarding the country west of the Missouri river. He was much interested and expressed himself as believing that there was nothing more important before the nation at that time than the building of a railroad to the Pacific coast."

Of his second interview with Mr. Lincoln, then president of the United States, four years later, General Dodge says: "When I reached Washington and reported to the president I found that he had called me to Washington to consult as to the proper place for the initial point of the Union Pacific railroad, which under the congressional act of 1862 he was empowered to select. He had not formulated any opinion as to the point of the Pacific hotel at Council Bluffs. I found him well posted in all the conditions and discussion such a selection and we went into the matter at length and discussed the arguments presented by the competing points. After going over all the facts that could be presented to him, President Lincoln stated that the business interests of the Missouri valley would where our surveys determined the proper location—at Council Bluffs. After this discussion of the matter he took up with me the question of building the road. The law of 1862 was framed on a strong any omission or men to undertake the work, and I said to him that in my opinion private enterprise could not build the road. Mr. Lincoln said that the government had its hands full and could not undertake the work; that it was a great undertaking and that it was fullest least extent and amend the law so as to enable such a company to issue securities that would furnish the necessary funds. I went to New York and informed my associates in the enterprise the result of my visit with the president and what he had said. They were greatly encouraged and immediately went to work on the preparation of the measure, which was afterward presented to congress and passed as the Pacific Railroad act of 1864. Under this act the road was built in four years, although congress had allowed ten years for its construction.

"I feel that it was Lincoln's faith, energy and comprehensive grasp of what the building of the road meant to the United States that induced congress to pass liberal laws and assist it possible to relax the funds to accomplish the work."

Member of Lincoln's Bodyguard

J. W. Nichols Saw Him Often.

J. W. NICHOLS, watchman at the postoffice building, Omaha, belonged to Company B, 150th Pennsylvania infantry, that was detailed in August, 1862, as the personal bodyguard for President Lincoln, and continued on duty that day at the White House until June, 1865. Mr. Nichols says:

"I saw Mr. Lincoln almost every day from August, 1862, until his death, the early morning of April 15, 1865, and was afterwards one of the bodyguard to President Andrew Johnson until our final discharge from the service in June, 1865. We were quartered in temporary barracks just south of the executive department building in the White House grounds. It was our duty to escort Mr. Lincoln to and from his summer home at the Soldiers' Home during the summer months. We were with him personally and he knew most of us by name. Tad Lincoln was at our quarters most of the time.

"Tad was a most lovable young fellow, and was the favorite son of the president, and for this reason I think Mr. Lincoln always had a very kindly feeling for Company B. One thing that always rather amused my regarding Mr. Lincoln was the way in which he would respond to a salute. He always worn an old-fashioned plug hat, and in returning a salute he would swing his hat in a long sweep from arm around back over his shoulder and grasp his hat by the top instead of the rim and then bring it down in front of him. I often thought he did this some for the fun of the thing, but he really return a salute. He would much sooner grasp a person by the hand even than it kindly and warmly. Mr. Lincoln was one of the kindest and best men. His face bore the inter-pretation of his soul. He was an expression of the deepest sadness. He seldom smiled, but whenever he would meet a soldier, no matter how humble his rank or however dirty or ragged were his clothes, Mr. Lincoln always stopped him and spoke to him in the kindliest manner.

"I shall never forget the night of his assassination. Yet I had a premonition that something was going to happen, but did not connect Mr. Lincoln with it in any way. We had sent to the Post-Jeffies parade that day and were pretty tired. Mr. Lincoln sent word out to the company that it need not go to duty that evening, as he was going to the theater and would not need a guard. Two or three of the boys went to the theater that night, and when the president was shot one of them came running down to the barracks and told us. The company was under arms in an hour, and we double-quicked up to the theater and were the first troop on the ground. The commanding officer immediately took charge of the situation and we drove the populace back from the front of the theater and then posted the entrance to the Peterson house, where the president was carried. The Peterson house was a red brick, two-story house sitting above a high basement, west of French flat, and was one of a row of similar houses alongside. The president was carried into these steps and laid on a bed in the front room, I think, where he died the following morning at twenty-five minutes past 7 o'clock.

"Of course, everything was in the utmost confusion. Mrs. Lincoln fainted and it was thought for a while that she was dead. I think that those most affected by the tragedy were Secretary Welles, Secretary Stanton and Postmaster General Dennison. Secretary Stanton's grief was most pathetic. He said repeatedly as he leaned over the body of the dying president: 'No one known, or will ever know, the correct of these years, nor how you and I have suffered and been misunderstood, and now I am left all alone, all alone.' Of course, very few people were admitted to the house, been in fact except those connected with the higher officers of the government. We posted a guard at the Peterson house until the day after the death of the president was removed to the White House. We continued on guard there until the morning of April 19, and, oh, how we missed the gentle, kind face and greeting of Mr. Lincoln.

"There was not a man or boy of us but felt that we had lost more than a father in that great and good man. We had come to love him as men than mortal. Not that we stood in awe of him, but that we loved him and esteemed him more than any other mortal being."

Heard Lincoln and Douglas Debate

Judge Cockrell Knew Them Well.

JUDGE GEORGE C. COCKRELL, one of the best Jurists of the peace, is a man who not only knew Lincoln, but who also met him intimately the time the great emancipator was in Alton, Ill., for one of his debates with Stephen A. Douglas, and Judge Cockrell even acted as marshal of the day during that memorable contest.

It was on October 15, 1858, that two rivals for the senatorship from Illinois met in Alton for one of the debates that have since gone down in history as among the greatest of world battles. Douglas, being the leader of the political faction with which Judge Cockrell was affiliated at that time, registered at the latter's hotel, while Lincoln became a guest at the home of Dr. Gilman.

"Even on the day of the debate Lincoln was willing to go to see his friend, and they had a witty talk together at my hotel," says Judge Cockrell, recalling the occasion of the debate. "Many people came to see the two men, sentiment and popular opinion being about equally divided between the two at that time.

"Wagons were used by hundreds of farmers and their wives, bagpies being scarce, and trips of fifty or sixty miles to hear one of the great debates were not uncommon. There must have been 15,000 people in Alton the time the debate was held there. And I was made marshal of the day, although I was only 22 years of age. It certainly kept me busy to look after that big crowd.

"Tall, awkward and homely, Lincoln's appearance was in marked contrast to that of his opponent in the debate, for Douglas was well-appearing. But there was no advantage in Douglas' address over Lincoln's, for Abe was a powerful speaker and he made just as much of a hit with the Alton people as Douglas did. He was popular with the people.

"Lincoln's whiskers were a reality during the time I knew him, when his debate with Douglas was going on. He shaved them off when he was for the presidency two years later.

"Lincoln knew how to talk to the best advantage. Whenever he got either warm or his speeches he would stop awhile and tell a story to get next to his audience and then then up, so that they never were given a chance to get tired. His power of holding an audience was one of his greatest assets. With plain language and good pronunciation of words he held his audiences in rapt attention.

"Every one in the state had read of Abe Lincoln, but it was the debates that brought him out before the country. I don't know but what Lincoln had things figured out pretty well about how his debates and later contests were going to result. He once told Douglas during the debates that Douglas might win the seat in the senate, but he could never become president on his slavery platform."

On the fifteenth anniversary of the Alton debate Judge Cockrell was invited to go to Alton to attend the reunion and the regeneration of the original contest between Lincoln and Douglas. He accepted with great pleasure and spent several days there. He has this to say about the reproduction of the debate:

"The platform for the speeches was in the same place by the city hall as the original one had been, and the Alton citizens had endeavored to reproduce, as far as possible, the scenes of fifty years ago. There was an immense torchlight parade, but only about 100 of the old crowd were alive to take in the reunion."

As for Lincoln's death, Judge Cockrell, who fought in the war, says:

"We had just taken a town on Mobile bay and were at Blakeley, Ala., when the news came of Lincoln's death reached us. It threw the whole regiment into deep mourning not only outwardly, but with personal feeling and great sincerity. The boys were spurred to fight all the harder when they learned the president had been killed."

When Lincoln Spoke at Council Bluffs

H. E. Field Recalls the Event.

H. FIELD, a pioneer of Council Bluffs, living at 140 Park avenue, that city, was present at the speech addressed by Abraham Lincoln in Council Bluffs in the fall of 1858.

"I remember the visit of Mr. Lincoln to Council Bluffs very distinctly," says Mr. Field. "He came here by steamboat from St. Joseph, Mo. It was the year after his great debate with Stephen A. Douglas, and we all were curious to see and hear him. The political sentiment of this community was then strongly democratic and we were all admirers of Mr. Douglas. The question of the extension of slavery to the free states had already been settled by the Missouri compromise, so the slave question was not bothering us to any serious extent. There was no particular demonstration over the arrival of Mr. Lincoln, or Old Abe, as he was more popularly known. He spoke in the old concert hall, corner of Sixth street and Broadway. Here the opera house now stands.

"Judge Tuer, a former Indianian, but then in business in the Bluffs, spoke for some night. He was a democrat and was engaged to reply to Lincoln's address. I think that Mr. Lincoln was the guest of W. H. B. Casady while in the city. I do not remember who presided at the meeting. Mr. Lincoln's speech was along argumentative lines similar to those presented in his debate with Douglas. He compared the conditions of the states where freedom prevailed with the slave-holding states and made an earnest plea for human freedom. He said that he would not interfere with slavery where it already existed, but was opposed to its further extension. He did not arraign the democratic party at all severely, and I realize that that he greatly strengthened the republican cause in his speech. He certainly made friends by his temperate address.

"Judge Tuer in his reply took the broad democratic ground and intimated that the democratic party was entitled to leaving well enough alone. He denied Mr. Lincoln's charge that the democratic party had allowed its leaders in whatever impracticable or radical measures they advocated. That was about the substance of Judge Tuer's reply and it was not much of a debate, after all.

"Lincoln made a good impression, as well as making lots of friends. I had met him at the Bluffs and the people remained his steadfast friends ever afterward.

"As I remember him, he was tall, awkward and ungainly, and also homely, but his earnestness impressed me, as it did all who heard him."

Omaha Woman Who Knew Booth

Mrs. Marrow Tells Interesting Story.

MRS. MARY A. MARROW, 3059 Charles street: "I well remember the night of President Lincoln's assassination. I lived in the same row of flats on Tenth street, between E and F Washington, about five doors from the Peterson house in which the body of President Lincoln was removed after he was shot in Ford's theater the night of April 14, 1865. I was then Miss Mary Sardo, my father was Bartholomew Sardo, who was then connected in an editorial capacity with the Chicago Times. Mr. J. Wilkes Booth, the assassin of President Lincoln, was well known to all of us young people living opposite Ford's theater. He occasionally took rooms in the Peterson house, because of its accessibility to the theater. I was a frequent visitor there, knowing William Peterson and his family quite well. Peterson has two daughters and one son. The daughters were intimates of mine and we very frequently went to the theater together across the street.

"On the evening of the assassination of the president I had been invited by Mr. Booth to go to the theater with him to see Laura Keene in her production of 'The American Cousin.' I had intended to go with the Peterson girls, but being a Catholic and the day being Good Friday, I did not get ready early that evening. About six o'clock my brother came to my room and asked me, saying that the president had been shot over in the theater and to get up at once. I dressed hurriedly and went to the parlor window. The street was then thronged with people, the mass of humanity and soldiers were hurrying in the direction of the theater. Shortly afterward a pathway was cleared through the crowd from the theater to the Peterson house, which did directly across the street from Ford's theater. I saw the body of the president borne through the pathway between two lines of military thus formed the crowd back from in front of the house and theater.

"The body of the president was taken into the servants' room, which is on the first floor above a high basement of the Peterson house. The room was very small, and I could get but a glimpse of it. We did not go into the Peterson house that night, but did the following morning after the president died. Mrs. Peterson took me into the room and showed me the blood-stained pillows upon which President Lincoln's head had rested. That same day my entire family was placed under arrest under the presumption that Booth had secreted himself in our house. We remained under arrest only that day, for it had been ascertained that Booth at that time was roaming with Mrs. Surratt on H street, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets.

"I have always believed that Mrs. Surratt was wholly innocent of any complicity with President Lincoln's assassination. Booth and his confederates simply roomed there, and I believe that she was unjustly hung. She could not, by any possible means, know the assassin character of any of her roomers, and hence knew nothing of Booth."

Saw Fatal Shot Fired

David Dorn Witness of Murder.

DAVID DORN of Boston accompanied President Lincoln assassinated. Mr. Dorn was at Ford's theater in Washington that fatal night and saw J. Wilkes Booth fire the shot that ended the life of the man who had led the embattled characters to history. He gives a most graphic description of this tragedy.

Mr. Dorn had served his country as a member of the First United States cavalry, and was stationed at Boston, but was in the hospital at Washington. He went to the theater that night on crutches and he believes that he not been crippled he might have caught Booth.

"I was sitting alone in the upper tier of boxes when I recognized him and saw the whole tragedy," said Mr. Dorn. "I was on crutches. The president was sitting in a box facing the audience, and toward the stage side partly obscured a full view of all those in the box. But there was Booth, standing in the doorway, with his pistol in his hand and possibly another man and women were in the box. Mr. Lincoln sat pretty well toward the front. Laura Keene was on the stage at the moment playing 'Our American Cousin.'

"I noticed that Mr. Lincoln was laughing at something in the play. Just then I noticed the smoke in the box of Mr. Lincoln's box pulled apart and I looked squarely at the man as he came in. At that moment he was one of the most attractive actors bringing in a piece of water and decanter, for something chose in each of the hands.

"Just then a shot rang out and Mr. Lincoln seemed partly to rise from his sitting position and then sank back and his head hanged forward and I saw a little trickle of blood coming down his cheek. Mrs. Lincoln screamed and Major Rathbone rose quickly and turned to enter the box, when Booth met him with a dirk knife and, breaking loose from Major Rathbone, put one foot on the rail of the front of the box and swung toward the stage. His spur caught in the flag and Booth partly fell on the stage. Laura Keene screamed as Booth rose to his feet, limping and waving the dagger, spoke out in a deeply tragic voice, 'Sic Semper Tyrannis,' and then ran toward the rear of the stage.

"Some of the boys with me made an effort to get onto the stage and catch Booth, but they were held back and someone called out, 'Be calm, men, he is crippled in his left shinbone.' Booth was regarded the loss of my leg than that mistake. I could have caught Booth when he darted to the stage, for I was an active lad in those days before my wound. But then I was helpless. All I could do was cry.

"Necessarily I was one of the last persons to leave the theater. Mr. Lincoln had been taken some little time before. The curtain had been lowered in the meanwhile. Though it was raised shortly afterward, when one of the theater people came to the front and said that Booth had escaped and that the back window had been found open on a horse. Soldiers filed in immediately afterward and took possession of the theater."

Inside History of the Fiscal Measures of the Lincoln Administration

(Copyright, 1909, by the Chicago Tribune.)

ALMON F. CHASE, Mr. Lincoln's secretary of the treasury, was the soldier of some of the boldest measures of finance ever undertaken by a military establishment in a time of war. The problem was how to raise, by the establishment of an incontrovertible currency, the money so urgently and imperatively demanded; the successful floating of nearly $1,000,000,000 of loans; the creation of a new and untried national banking system by which the government could make bankers and capitalists the willing instruments during four years of the greatest crisis, financially, the desperate war which the world has ever witnessed.

These measures were described to me by the soldier himself. It was on a Sunday afternoon in the spring of 1864, in Washington, that I, as a financial officer of the government, had a long talk with him, who then was in S. Chase, and in a financial officer of the government, had a long talk with him, who then was in S. Chase, and in a financial officer of the government, had a long talk with him, who then was in S. Chase, and in

Horace White on a Critical Period in Life of the Republican Party

Influences That Worked Together to Bring About Results of Lasting Benefit

BY HORACE WHITE.

(Copyright, 1909, by the Chicago Tribune.)

THE critical period in the life of Abraham Lincoln and in the history of the United States was one of transition from the ante-bellum months succeeding his election to the war period. It is the commonly accepted idea that Lincoln he was the chief barrier against any number of the principles upon which he had been elected. This belief is well founded. He was a barrier at all important times, but the principal one, because he alone was in a position to be effective against the will of the South and the zeal of the others would have been of any avail whatever.

At Springfield, Ill., on November 20, 1860, there was a conference of the centers of Lincoln and Illinois, at which speeches were made by Lyman Trumbull, Leonard Swett, Jesse K. Dubois and Richard Yates Mr. Lincoln was present, but did not participate. The tenor of the speeches was to urge upon the incoming president of the time for his power and set course. He wished to be his friends for him, and to see whether the compromises in the slave holding states would increase or reduce. Trumbull in dwelling about the influence of this public sentiment, and Swett in dwelling upon the loyalty of the South and the words the following week in Chicago, and Lincoln listened to them and made no remarks beyond a part of his own speech.

Mr. Dubois said that for the remainder of organization gives entire confidence in the Republican party, and power and influence of the states will be left in its control. Yates said that the South was in a delirious state, and so perplexed that they choose and employ their own means of protecting property and preserving peace and order within their respective limits in the Union, and they will not be coerced into secession. Those who have voted for Mr. Lincoln are not responsible for his acts, and they would not have voted for him had they supposed he would do what he has done. Lincoln's speech, the pieces of the whole country that the point, upon which the republicans have stood, long and so persistently misrepresented, is now brought to a public test and placed beyond the possibility of a doubt. Disunion is not the object of the party, nor any part of its union, precisely because they propose to preserve the Union, and to secure to the states and citizens the rights and privileges that their home and firesides are to be endangered by the action of the federal government. With such "Now or Never" in the mouth, and all of the political preparations in the south. It will be a wonder if the South will not at once pass over against the North which these misrepresentations have so long and so strongly charged. Lincoln's inaugural address, Mr. Trumbull's speech and were printed in the newspapers, and the effect of Lincoln's handwriting is still preserved.

Lincoln Inaugurated.

The following letters from Lincoln throw light on the state of his mind immediately after the election:

(PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL)

Springfield, Ill., Dec. 15, 1860.—Hon. B. Thurlbell My Dear Sir—Let there be no compromise on the question of extending slavery. If there be, all our labor is lost, and we may as well go home for again. The disagreement cannot be made whole among our friends now, if there be any such, we are done. Have none of it. Stand firm. The law is on our side, and time is on our side. Yours truly, hoping for you,

A. LINCOLN.

(CONFIDENTIAL)

Springfield, Ill., Dec. 19, 1860.—Hon. Thurlbell My Dear Sir—Trouble is hard work to the mind and body, and so, again with three short words, I write you that I am well, and that I am anxious all well. I think would do much good if Mr. Douglas and his friends would spend a week in Boston. They do not touch the institution of slavery, and yet they do not touch it. Let them do so, and, if possible, call upon the south to do the same. Let the south see that we are patriotic, that we are willing to do anything that fairness allows, and that we will do anything that fairness does not allow. Let the south see that we are willing to do anything that fairness does not allow. Let the south see that we are willing to do anything that fairness does not allow. Let the south see that we are willing to

WHEN a man rises to such heights as the world this speech be the prayer of all who hope well for him. May he be honorable, industrious and sane!

Personally, I believe in prayer. However, I do not believe that God permits men to pray for success in tangible and definite results before intelligently proved that such prayer is not sinnish. Neither is contrived and selfish. Of course, life is a terrible commodity, so serious that it is dreadful. But I must state it to emphasize the point I am making. The entire human mind is so constructed that there must be a reaction from extremes. There are in the world those who treat a man who has risen to such heights as Lincoln as if he had fallen from the sky. We see the wonder of wise counsel, but that counsel seems to be without the human element that some fellow human being has actually lived it out in the flesh. We like to be proved the Pollyfiddles for power and success. And so it is that Lincoln's life is a practical help to young men.

Lincoln's life is for young men because it shows that the idea of achieving success, right from a holement of conquering purpose, was that in the heart of the poets by "Pictureby Lincoln." It is said that the poet's dream is a mere vision that he cannot know then by heart. Alexander, Lycurgus and others of that short breed of human mastery produced no lasting results. Lincoln's purpose was possible on a lower level for successful, and his man can know how many inspire have been set to music that thrilled and commanded great public audiences, legislative bodies and finally the nation. Inspiration by young men hearing that the God-Jehovah's Inclination Inspiration to Great Demonstrations.

Become a Type.

The thing that stirred young men who has the stuff in him is something not the lives of great men achieve and thus throughout all history and is determining to do the like.

"For," says the world-wide young man to himself, "what any man has done I can do," and when the young man sees that he sees rightly and has taken the first step to prove it. So Abraham Lincoln became to us as much of a type and a model as Caesar and Alexander and Napoleon—a new type and a better pattern. Lincoln's life is for young men because it shows that the type of man who has risen must have lived the plain people, he made of little—all of it, perhaps—in due time he rise up to the general time we are still near the sill and our change more from the plain people. Without a little counsel he no inspiration to young men. Without a little counsel of a man of the plain people, of our country, a man of a type, distinctive and theoretical and, the life is a problem and can reach the young men of the plain people can not be inspired by the political structures and become Lincolnesque. And that means to be inspired to be honest, industrious and practical idealists, the achievers of visions, the realizers of dreams.

I find that most young men who are interested in the reading of literature, politics or science find some the latter of the idealists inspire—they come up through hard work and study and experience which they are wild, and I am sure that there are a million of them in this country. I am speaking among the working classes of our citizens who are not so interested and determined to make their lives count for something in the world. Lincoln's life is for such because it is a practical example to them that the Lincoln's life is a personal message—a direct message to them—a message by the model of that himself through the deeds and thoughts of a man who is their beloved American.

He Knew Poverty.

For Lincoln, too, was in the case with the young men of today, he was a poor man, he was a man who knew what was life, knew poverty, he bitterness, he disadvantage, he great handicap, and yet the power of which you, young men, are complaining Lincoln turned into the gold of achievement.

Advantage Turned to Success.

Lincoln attained a national reputation when a new propaganda of sound environments and of sound conditions of life had been created by the Lincoln-Douglas debates. Yet when it was proposed it was, of course, the Republican party, the party of conviction were more politicians. Even the party of the Democrats had more of a man or defending that one, of fixing up a ticket that would catch as many votes as of votes as possible. Nobody except the great democrats of the time cared for the set of principles believed in anything at all. The nominating speeches were tame, and the party of conviction, of principle, as well have been spoken by phonographs. The accepted platform of the hour scarcely not even the dreaming interest of the people. Lincoln had to fit out one set of men of them knew what it contained. But the other men did know what their purpose platform was. They believed in it; they fought for it; they understood the words that burned even through the lay minds of the people and made them feel the Great Debate. They had Lincoln's ideas, and therefore Lincoln's inspiration.

Pulled with His Hands.

But we are now coming to the larger things of life; let us get down to the main subject of this talk. Lincoln's life is practical, I have, felled practically, felled with his hands, felled with his hands, felled with his hands
